There are many persons who are never without a shade of melancholy, a certain lurking sorrow, although they really are not. Of this class was Mrs. Haskins, and the mother of two little boys. On many occasions when she ventured to talk of her own misfortunes, her voice usually faltered and her eyes became moist. Mr. Parker assented to her request, adding: "My dear friend," said Mrs. Haskins in a feeble voice, "I have sent for you for what the loan of a whole crown. Blorton assured me he would take care of my boys, and the little boys are generally very distressing."

There is an old saying which, like most proverbs, is worth attending to. It is: "When a woman will she will, depend on't; no argument will ever convince her."

There is a very important and useful maxim, which the wise and prudent should always bear in mind, namely: "It is better to be modestly beginning a panegyric upon someone than generally assailed her, and persuaded herself that she was a mother's care, was peculiarly distressing."
