Would you oppose or support a switch to the semester system at UCSB?

Jean Lagerquist, electrical engineering, senior

I oppose it. Well, now the vacations come at just the right time. The semester system lasts too long -1 think you'd get bored with your classes. And the quarter system is really nice for science majors because you are able to take more electives.

Bruce Tomlinson, business economics, sophomore

Support it. Mostly because a lot of my friends are on the semester system at other schools so I'd rather be on the semester system. You usually get out earlier. I like it better. I don't like going for three quarters — it's too short. Besides that I hate trying to get classes at the start of every guarter.

Kathie Plouff, psychology, junior

I would oppose it. Because then (classes) would be longer, and if you don't like the class, you would be stuck with it for a longer period of time. But the main reason is that you would probably put off things. I would think "Oh, I have plenty of time, I'll just wait until the end of the semester." And so I would just be as rushed during a semester as I would during a quarter.

Alias Yusof, computer science, graduate student

I support the semester system, because I used the semester system in my country, Malaysia. With the system we have, in 10 weeks, we don't have enough time. For instance, in computer science we have a lot of work for the teacher tends to give everything in 10 weeks so we have projects, and we don't have time to prepare for the final. But in my experience with the semester system, we have more time and at least we can do a good job, compared to the quarter system.

Priscilla Lopez, undeclared, freshman I would oppose it. I like the quarter system. It goes by faster. It seems my college years won't take that long.

Stephanie Gitti, speech and hearing, junior

I would support it. I just think it gives you a longer time for vacations, and you can get into your subject more. You get out of school earlier so you can get summer jobs. The quarter system is too rushed. The semester system allows you time. In case you're sick, you can take a few days off and not miss anything, whereas under the quarter system you are always talking a test and you're always rushed.

Another View of the Campus by the Sea

By Cindy Fonstein he UCSB campus,

with its ocean breezes and craggy mountain backdrop, attracts many students because of its physical attributes. The relative flatness of the land appeals to bicyclists and runners alike. Yet amid the spinning of the thousands of bicycle wheels are the steady turning of the other wheels. For UCSB's estimated 120 permanent and temporarily disabled students, the campus' flatness is among the many assets that make everyday life easier

Since 1977, when Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Joseph Califano drew up federal guidelines to help end discrimination against the nation's 35 million disabled, UCSB has made substantial changes to improve its own facilities to help the handicapped. Renovated bathrooms, ramps, elevators, widened doorways, lowered electric switches and drinking fountains, and new handicapped residences are among the recent innovations.

In the past few years, handicapped units have been installed in Santa Cruz dorms as well as four handicapped apartments in the Married Student Housing on the Storke Campus. The new Santa Yhez apartments contain 15 units especially for handicapped students. According to campus Senior Architect Jay Anderson, future plans call for more work in the residence halls as well as the West Campus Married Student Housing.

According to Jeff Bass, UCSB Special Services Instructor, the changes have been successful. "This campus is probably one of the most accessible of the U.C. campuses," he said. "The marvelous weather and flat grounds are important too."

Base is not alone in his views on UCSB's accessibility. In 1979, the California Post-Secondary Education Commission reported that "this institution (is) an excellent model as an accessible campus.

The efforts have been appreciated by the campus' disabled students. Linda Scronce, a freshman majoring in psychology, feels the campus is becoming quite accessible to the handicapped. "I think it does really well, generally speaking. I haven't run into many problems.

Nathan Howarter, a freshman business economics major, who like Linda was born with a rare birth defect, agrees on the adequacy of the campus accessibility. "For me, it's been really good. No real major problems.

Theresa Peretik, a junior speech and hearing major, has watched the campus change in her three years here. "I've seen a lot of changes for the good. Especially this quarter and last quarter. There has been curb cutting and ramp making like crazy.

The constructon has greatly enhanced the accessibility at UCSB. "I can get around almost anywhere," John Dorsett, a former UCSB gymnast who suffered an injury last year, leaving him paraplegic, said. "The campus does pretty well.

In spite of all the improvements made in the past several years, UCSB is far from being 100 percent accessible to handicapped students. "There's probably not a campus in the United States that is 100 percent accessible. It's impossible to be because of funding," Jeff Bass said. At UCSB, both federal and state funds are used in accessibility projects. The availability of more funds would help address the remaining access problems, according to Theresa Peretik, a UCSB handicapped student. "Improvements could be made in the two main areas, bathrooms and elevators," she said. Peretik cited the elevators in South Hall, Noble Hall, and the UCen as being particularly inadequate. "Often the emergency buttons are so high that if I were to get stuck I wouldn't be able to get out alone. Some other difficult areas around campus are in the lecture halls. For example, in Chem 1179 a step at the back of the lecture hall prevents students in wheelchairs from sitting close to the front. As Nathan Howarter explained, 'The step makes it hard to get close. And it's nice to be up front.

The same probem exists in Girvetz 1004. "The step limits you," Peretik said. 'I can't go anywhere past the back row and the lighting is bad in the back. Tony Rodriguez, a senior majoring in political science agreed. "The step makes it awkward to talk to the professor," he said.

The recent innovations on campus, combined with the natural levelness of the area. make UCSB compare favorably to other campuses. Bob Bennett, a sophomore biology major, visited UCLA and UCSF before deciding on UCSB. 'Those campuses were too hilly. I like the weather here," he said. "I like to be close to the beach because I like to sail.

The proximity of the buildings at UCSB appealed to Linda Scronce, "It's not sprawled out like UCSD. Here everything is compact. The dorms are close to the classrooms and that's a definite plus."

"The best campus I visited was U.C. Riverside, partly because their facilities are a real drawing factor," Scronce said.

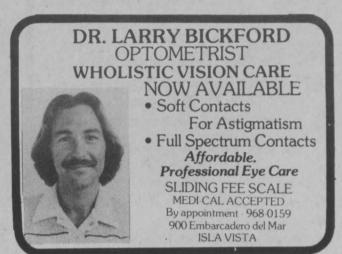

"UCR had lots of electric doors and ramps all around. You can never have too many types of facilities.

Scronce is used to living in highly accessible areas. Growing up in Bishop, home of the legendary ex-skier Jill Kinmont who became disabled in a ski accident, Scronce was surrounded by a wide num er of handicapped amenities.

Jeff Bass cited the newness of the buildings at this campus as an asset in making it more accessible. "We're a more modern campus. At Berkeley you're dealing with incredible architectural nightmares. Because of their newness, for example, Davis and Santa Cruz would be easier to renovate.' According to Jay Anderson,

The Yogonut tree, thought to be extinct, has bounced back. And it's full of those special gifts that once made it a legend: Apples, raspberries, raisins, sunflower seeds... even little cups of yogurt.

Once found everywhere, the Yogonut tree dropped out of sight due largely to a public preference for factory food in the 1950's. This trend has reversed itself, however. A campus spokesperson announced that the trees have been brought on to campus for the good of all.

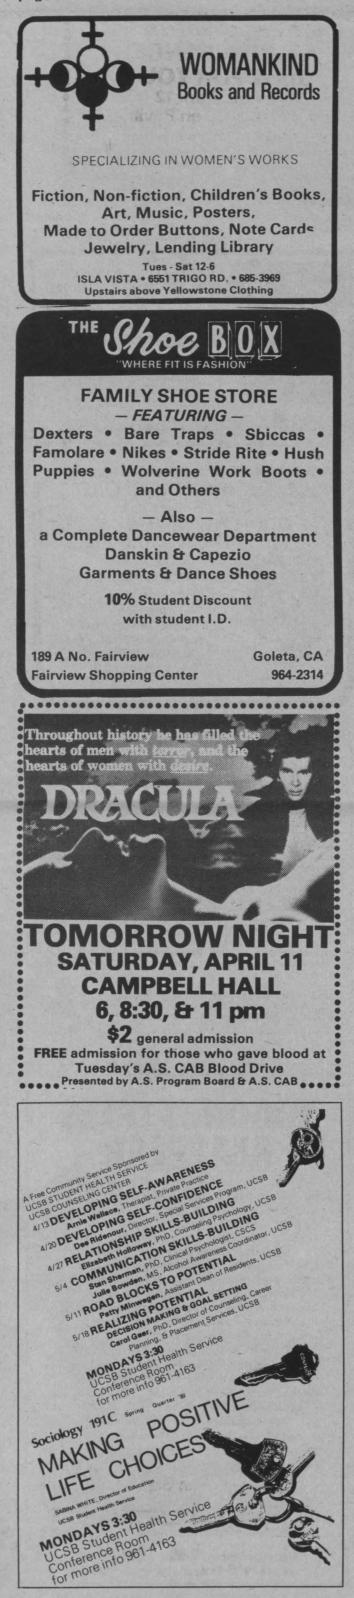

Now it's easy to protect the Yogonut tree. And good tasting too. Because all the natural things from the Yogonut tree are packed into the Yogonut™ bar. Which is packed in stores everywhere.

So enjoy the Yogonut bar. And protect a legend, please.

Remember: Take care of it, and it'll take care of you.

hat is now called the "Bonzo phenomena" can be traced back to an experiment at Yale some 30 years ago by a professor who tried raising a chimp as a child. Sparking the imaginations of two young screen writers, Ted Berkman and Raphael Blau, together they produced the screenplay for the 1951 box office smash, Bedtime for Bonzo.

Although the star of the movie and it's sequel was a five-year-old chimpanzee, the role of the college professor was landed by the then fledgling actor Ronald Reagan. Although Berkman described his performance as merely 'adequate," Reagan's subsequent campaign for governor of California and the presidency proved much more successful and served to elevate Bedtime for Bonzo from the annals of movie history to what may eventually become a multi-million dollar enterprise.

For Berkman, a resident of Santa Barbara, what started out 30 years ago as fun, "a way of making wry comments," has recently blossomed into a very big business. Berkman and Blau are now the majority holders of Bonzo Enterprises, which has sold licenses to manufacture Bonzo belt buckles, suspenders, and jewelry. Plans for a Bonzo doll, jewelry, and a Bonzo cartoon are also under way. In addition, a new chimp, Bonzo III, has now replaced the original who died in a fire in 1952.

Yet for Berkman, Bonzo has remained a light and minor side of his long and varied career as a novelist, screenwriter, journalist, teacher, and musician. His books include The Lady and the Law, To Seize the Passing Dream, Cast a Giant Shadow, and others. As well as Bedtime for Bonzo. Berkman's film credits include, among others, Fear Strikes Out, a highly acclaimed 1957 film which received the Christopher Award for general excellence, and "The Edge of Fury." Berkman will soon be teaching a course in screenwriting at the UCSB Extension starting April 15. Designed for beginners, the course will be held on Wednesday nights from 7-10 p.m. for six weeks. In an interview with Portal, Berkman discussed the Bonzo phenomenon-its origins and repercussions, connection with Reagan, and its political and financial future.

and heredity. We hoped that Grant would deliver these great satiric jokes with devastating precision, and the charm and the whole bit. We saw a big movie coming out of

To our enormous disappointment, it got sold to Universal, not to Paramount. And a fellow named Ronald Reagan - whoever heard of Ronald Reagan? It was strictly a second class name at the box office. So we swallowed our chagrin, and went on to do something else. And the next thing that happened was columns out of Hollywood started sprouting pieces about this chimp who was playing in Bedtime for Bonzo. So we perked up our ears again. It turned out the chimp was drawing more people to the studio than Olivier and Vivian Leigh who had just come over from England.

Portal: Where did they get the chimp?

Berkman: The chimp came from somewhere in Liberia, in Africa, and I believe has made a brief appearance in supporting roles in Tarzan. This was of course a big promotion for him. He had been a bit player before, and here he had the prospect of being practically a star, which indeed he emerged as. He quickly learned that he was a kind of celebrity. He had his own makeup man, and then they gave him a bungalow just like any other star.

straight forward simplicity, made the perfect contrast with a chimp who was always hopping around on the chandeliers. It turned out to be good casting.

Portal: Did you think that this comparison held true in this presidential election? Was Bonzo still a perfect foil for Reagan?

Berkman: Yes. I think Reagan was very perceptive about that. He's a shrewd politician. When the t-shirts and the publicity started picking up, instead of ducking it, he got himself a mascot on the plane. And he ran with it instead of denying it or being super dignified about it. "That was my favorite picture," he told everybody.

Portal: When did the second movie, Bonzo Goes to College come out?

Portal: How did the Bonzo phenomenon begin?

Berkman: Well, about an experiment at Yale a professor had tried raising a chimp in his own home to try and demonstrate the unimportance of heredity. Now, my brother-in-law Rafe Blau and I have written on and off together for several years, and he said, "hey, let's do a comedy. Let's do something about a guy raising a chimp as a child."

"He took a shot at it alone actually at first, but it didn't quite jell, so he sent me his draft. It unfolded very rapidly. We sent it out to an agent on the West coast, and we thought maybe we would get Cary Grant in this sophisticated satirical movie about environment Berkman: No, we were reading about it. We were 3,000 miles away writing something else. We were working on a musical show at the time. We would get these reports in, but there were a lot of them, because Bonzo was great comedy.

Then the picture came out, and it promptly started breaking box office records in Cincinatti and Buffalo. There were big headlines in Variety. It made the best 10 variety pictures, the 10 box office winners (there were then 400-500 pictures a year.) And Bedtime for Bonzo was up there. Then Bonzo won the "Patsy,' the animal equivalent of an Oscar.

Portal: Did Reagan get anything out of this?

Berkman: Ah, who had heard of Reagan?

Portal: How do you feel Reagan performed in the movie?

Berkman: Adequately. Did you ever see Reagan in the movies? He's never more than adequate. In King's Road, he was momentarily perhaps agreeable. But he was not Cary Grant. He didn't have those dimples, or that roguish eye, or any of that stuff. He was very square. So he played a college professor, and he was really the perfect foil. He was a straight man in the comedian's lingo See, Grant would have over-shadowed the chimp, or at least competed with him, but Reagan didn't. Reagan just provided the perfect background. See, Reagan, being so solid and reliable, projecting this square-jawed, | Portal: After Bonzo Goes to College, did

A still photo which appeared on the co by Berkman, for the movie Bedtime

Berkman: About two or three years after the first one. Reagan was not in that. There have been various news accounts. Reagan's camp. during the presidential election, said he didn't want to play it. In fact Reagan used it to make a point in his campaign. He was arguing that a lot of what Carter did was not credible, and was not adding to the American image of credibility around the world. "What is credibility?" someone asked him. He said, "Well, raising the chimp as a human child, that was a credible, plausible story idea, but having a chimp go to Yale, that was incredible, so I turned it down." This was his way of establishing his sort of superior credibility. This was his own story that he told. Other accounts would have it that Universal thought they didn't need him.

Terkman: Was he forgotten do you mean? Yes. Yet again, it was kind of odd. Bonzo and his replacement were both smothered in a fire hat swept the animal compound. At that time we had a deal with Ideal Toys, the biggest toy nanufacturer in the country. That deal got viped out. Soon after that Reagan went into politics. We went on to do other movies like Fear Strikes Out, which was Tony Perkin's irst picture.

When Reagan became governor, some of the opposition started dredging up the old hovies, and Bedtime for Bonzo became kind of a campus cult thing. All through the years it was shown time after time and everybody aughed at it, particularly in California. Johnny Carson kept the thing alive because the producer of the Tonight Show had been the director of Bedtime for Bonzo. He was went back and forth from my nephew, Rafe Blau's son, who said, "Hey, don't you guys have the rights to this stuff? You should do something with it." We laughed, but then the Canadian Broadcasting did a piece about Bonzo and the campaigns, and got the title wrong, mixing up the two pictures. So Blau, who lives in Nova Scotia, wrote them a polite little note with his Old English background pointess, saying, "I don't think you have your facts quite correctly." Well he got a call from Toronto asking if they could fly him up so he could tell this to the Canadian public at large And some guy at the Washington Star calls him in Toronto, and says, "I want to do a piece on this." So on the front page of the Washington Star there was a big splash about this wild, weird coincidence coming up 30 years later.

Then we decided that maybe we should indeed see if the film made any sense to commercialize. So Rafe went down to New York, and he interviewed four or five licensing outfits – places that do nothing but license the Muppets and Lil' Abner characters, and all that stuff. Well he picked a couple of guys, International Licensing Associates, who seemed to think they could do something with the possibility, and he signed an elaborate contract.

People started phoning me, and I began to see that it seemed to be rolling. A woman who lives in this complex, is with the scripts league. So I said to her one day last summer, "Why don't we whip up a little interview with Bonzo. Portal: How large is the enterprise now? Berkman: From what Gordon said today, I think that we are definitely over the top, that Bonzo is established in the public mind. With Knickerbocker, who is a big lure, and with the slumber bags and giftware, he said other people will be knocking at the door.

Portal: Do you know how much money is involved?

Berkman: He seems to be thinking in big numbers, like several zeros — quite a few zeros.

Portal: Do you think that the character will live on after Reagan's term has ended?

Berkman: Well, that's the idea, for him to have an identity of his own, which he seems to be acquiring. And among other things to cement that, there is a cartoon strip in the works by a very major guy.

Portal: What kind of qualities will the cartoon character have?

Berkman: Well, we are having a debate on that. Intelligence, amiability, and unpredictability would be three major elements. I had a letter from Rafe Blau this morning. He wants to emphasize those qualities. He would like to stress that our chimp, unlike others, comes with a human education built in, which is true of both Bonzo I and Bonzo III. He onstantly kidding Carson and other people on the show about Bonzo. So the name was ever totally absent from the public conciousness.

ortal: When did the recent interest in Bonzo egin?

Berkman: During the 1980 Conventions. Suddenly it was very alive. People started birating a few things like automobile stickers. During this election, to our mild astonishment, here were some buttons around. This was all vithout our authorizations. We had retained he commercial rights to the character of Bonzo.

Around Convention time, we saw a big sign hat said Bedtime for Jimmy. We said, What the hell is going on here?" The epublican Convention came on, and there rere stills from Bedtime for Bonzo So letters We'll say that Bonzo is living here on my balcony in Santa Barbara." We worked together a story which every paper ran.

Portal: But there wasn't actually a chimp?

Berkman: Well there wasn't one until people brought one here. It was strictly the fantasy chimp. But people were much amused with it. Apparently because there's an American political tradition of having fun at campaigns. It goes back to the earliest campaigns. This last one was hardly what you would call a sidesplitting couple of guys. Two deadpan, rather serious, dull people. Let's face it, none of them was Jack Kennedy, or even Lyndon Johnson. They're not colorful people.

Portal: What is Bonzo Enterprises, and how did that come about?

Berkman: Well, Bonzo Enterprises was formed by the International Licensing Associates, because you have to have some kind of corporate identity for him to license. We now have Knickerbocker Toys who are doing a Bonzo doll which will be marketed Christmas. We have a whole bunch of other stuff. Some of the things that have been licensed are the posters, heat transfers, belt buckles, suspenders, slumber bags, jewelry, and ceramic giftware music boxes. Gordon Howard, the guy who does the licensing thing, is going out to see one of the largest of the areeting card companies.

doesn't want if to become just like any other animal. Bonzo should come up with, in a sense, super human solutions. I would like to go in the direction of the new ecology, which says that animals probably have more right brain going on than we do.

Portal: How did you find Bonzo III?

Berkman: Bonzo III is a chimp we discovered after a very assiduous and careful search, because there were a number of candidates. J won't say that we combed every alley way in Detroit, but we did talk to a number of people – trainers who had chimps and psychologists and what not. We finally found that up in La Honda, California at a place called the Jungle Farm Safari, they had a chimp who had indeed been raised like a child. The chimp was living with this couple, and slept in the bedroom with their kid. He's very agreeable. He's my great buddy now, and he comes over and grabs my hand any-time he sees me.

Portal: In the t-shirts and other memorabilia, are you emphasizing the first Bonzo, or does Bonzo III come in at all?

Berkman: Bonzo III comes in increasingly now. There will be a new t-shirt with the new chimp. That is apparently the one the toy people want to work from.

opposite sex must be included in the top 10 gripes of any college student. Students are often either lamenting their lack of a relationship or grumbling about the problems they're having with their boy/girlfriend.

According to Debbie Dunn, coordinator for peer counselors at the I.V. Human Relations Center, "The main problems in a relationship are power struggles--who's going to be in control, and intimacy--how close or vulnurable people are going to be in a relationship. A lot of times people enter a relationship in which they are 'one up' and the other person is 'one down.' For many couples the question is how they can both be on the same level. "Often times the more intimate we become with someone, the more power we have to give up. The goal is to be as intimate as we want to be and not lose any power." Dunn added that it is usually women who end up giving up this power

Spencer Cahill, a sociology lecturer, at UCSB, agreed 'Male dominance is still the most typical situation," he said. "Men and women allow this to happen because we have an abstract understanding of sexroles."

One student who wrote a research paper for Cahill's class observed touching patterns at a sorority dance. "She found that the males almost always initiated touch." Cahill said. "When females did initiate it, males would not respond. It's not an aware kind of thing-that's the problem.

A recently conducted poll of UCSB men and women revealed a wide range of opinions about attitudes toward relationship problems.

One of the questions asked in the survey concerned opinions about how aggressive a woman should be if she wants to meet a particular man. Men's comments ranged from, "A girl that would ask me out, I would consider too aggressive," and "Show him you're interested, but don't be too intimidating and scare him," to "Come to the point. The male shouldn't carry the burden of making the first move. Too many games."

Only 13 out of the 56 men surveyed thought that a woman should "come to the point" and ask a man out. Dona Salpert, who does couples counseling at the UCSB Counseling Center, said, "It still appears not to be okay for a woman to ask a man out on a date. The majority of women are still concerned with what kind of a message that conveys, and there are still some men who would be scared by it."

However according to Kathy Bycel, the director of the UCSB Women's Center, the woman's role in a relationship has changed some in the past years. "Women are less likely to buy a lot of macho behavior from men and to play weak 'evelash batting' behavior. There is less denying of their intelligence. It used to be a woman didn't want to be a 'brain' because that made her less attractive."

Indeed, none of the men surveyed claimed to be threatened by a woman who achieved high grades. But a rather surprising number admitted they felt threatened by a very pretty woman. Some comments were, "Pretty girls are too hard to get to know-you have to be so aggressive, and they expect and get a lot of attention.

One male student admitted, "Girls who are pretty attract a lot of attention, and I would be constantly jealous."

Often good looks are not that high on the list of the qualities college students seek in the opposite sex. Jane Carlisle, who runs the "Relationships" workshop at the UCSB Counseling Center, said that her groups often discuss the ideal woman and ideal man.

"It's nice for everyone to discuss this, because it's qualities more like, 'He/she makes me feel comfortable and is sincere' (that attract people)" Carlisle said. "It's always a surprise--a woman imagines a man wants the perfect woman, and vice versa.

One common complaint made by college students about the members of the opposite sex is their lack of maturity. The majority of UCSB female students who took the survey felt that men their age on campus were less emotionally mature, although not as many male students felt that women were less mature.

One woman claimed, "Men are often inconsiderate of a woman's emotions and on a macho trip," and another felt that, "Relationships are too casually taken by men on campus. There is the attitude of 'when I have the time."

Men made comments such as, "Most women are too commercialized and mentally dependent upon what others think. Be yourself and be honest!" and "Women have much more trouble handling heir their emotions, which I consider emotional immaturity." One freshman wrote, "They all tend to be in high school still."

Many of the students surveyed felt that "things are changing" in men-women relationships. UCSB sociology professor John Baldwin felt that some progess had been made."There have been some changes, but most of them have been happening slowly," he said. "Sexism and the double standard are still around.

"Most men have learned to talk in a less sexist manner, but unfortunately they're still abusing women, and women are not speaking up for their rights," Baldwin continued.

Bycel agreed, saying, "Men are more aware of what not to say, but when it comes down to how they really feel in their gut, I'm not sure. They still make disparaging remarks about women's bodies - 'locker room talk' still goes on. Bycel added that men often don't see a connection between a good relationship with their girlfriend and their derogatory comments about women.

a state-funded project that began several weeks ago at UCSB should solve many of the remaining problems. Among the changes now in progress are the renovation of the restrooms in Campbell Hall, as well as the installation of ramps outside and a wheelchair landing area inside the hall

Augmenting the physical accessibility of UCSB, the campus offers services to help handicapped students. The Special Services program, a part of the federally funded Trio Program, assists disabled as well as reentry and transfer students. The SSP offers notetaking services in addition to academic and personal counseling. "SSP is very open and alert to new problems and ideas that are coming their way," Scronce said. One new program that SSP introduced is the campus Van Service. The service provides transportation around campus to both permanently and temporarily disabled students. For junior Penny Claunch, who was temporarily dependent on crutches following knee surgery, the Van Service was a life-saver. "They took me almost right up to my classes. It got-me to classes sooner and I wasn't so physically exhausted. A major element in providing disabled students with a meaningful college experience is student awareness. "I'd like to see an awareness day where wheelchairs could be brought in so students could wheel

Bonzo from pg. 5

Berkman: There are a lot of appeals about a chimp. A chimp is a great leveler in so fail as he reminds us of our not so lofty origins. One reason I think he appealed in the campaign was that he juxtaposed the most powerful officer on earth with this funny little animal who is almost a caricature of all of us. That's kind of irresistable. And as I say, it's an American political tradition not to take any politician seriously. You couldn't do this in England. You couldn't have a chimp up there with Prince Charles.

Portal: It has been mentioned before, that there is a comparison between Bonzo and the whole phenomenon of Teddy Roosevelt and the teddy bear. Do you think there is a similarity?

Berkman: Well you know the teddy bear was named for Roosevelt. It is Gordon Howard's hope (this is mainly in his head as a marketing genius) that ultimately, when we have the doll going, Bonzo will sort of return to the national fold, be recognized, and be connected with Reagan again. In the current phase, he's got to establish himself. But if he's enough of a national figure proposal of a plan to change Santa Cruz dorm into a door-todoor co-ed living environment.

Conrad Cieber, an R.A. at Santa Cruz, authored a report advocating total co-ed living. "You get more mature behavior and a chance to develop close relationships that de-emphasize sexual relations," he said. "Men and women get to know each other beyond stereotypical conceptions. For example, men come to understand that a woman is not beautiful 24 hours a day.'

A large majority of the students in the survey claimed they would consider living in a co-ed apartment. The few who said no did so for reasons of privacy or lack of parental approval. "My parents would choke," one woman commented.

However, many students had positive feelings about a co-ed living arrangement. "It might broaden my perspectives," one student said. Some men mentioned that women tend to keep an apartment cleaner, and some women said they would feel safer with men around.

Most of the students stressed again, it's almost inevitable that sooner or later, somebody's going to ask the president about him. And I think Reagan will probably reaffirm the old theory.

Portal: We have heard a lot of what other people want. Where would you like to see this go?

Berkman: Our original intent was satiric. We were making fun of intellectual pretense. The original story was that the professor was raising the chimp in order to contradict prejudice against his family because his father had been in jail. He was going to prove that it didn't matter where you came from. So this was the basic intent that Rafe and I had. In a sense, the chimp has sort of escaped from us.

Portal: What comment do you think Bonzo makes?

Berkman: Essentially he is a restorer of perspective. He is a deflator of human pomposity. That's his distinction. He's a Voltairesque kind of Candide character. He rambles through the world, kind of straightening out human pretention and folly. That's an interesting character. It's true, we may have drifted a great deal from that. But, as a writer, that's his significance to me.

anything deeper would ruin the household."

While most of the students surveyed were willing to venture into the non-traditional world of co-ed living, the majority of them still enjoyed the traditional institution of dating. Many of the women claimed they had less dates this year than last, and they wished they had more.

"It seems that no one in this community goes on 'traditional' dates," one woman said. "The attitude of the guy seems to be, 'Oh, I'll see you at a party or something." Another woman commented, "Nobody really seems to go on dates -- a lot of guys just want sex, but they won't give anything in return."

One man who enjoys traditional dating said, "I like to go out to nice places with a date. Don't know why, but romanticism has a 'cool' feeling."

The people who didn't enjoy "traditional" dating had specific reasons. "I don't really feel comfortable or even like 'traditional' dating," a woman said. "I usually don't get to

However, Alpert felt that the double standard was diminishing somewhat. "In certain segments of the population, those attitudes are changing," she said. "In the college student population, there is less of a double

Many problems such as the double standard arise from the fact that for many years

separate "rules of conduct"

"From early in life men and women are segregated from each other," Cahill said. 'They're perceived as very different kinds of creatures. Problems are created by this segregation, and the more sex= typed people have more stressful interactions."

An attempt to cope with this segregation problem has been made here on campus, with the

the fact that the relationships must be platonic in order for this arrangement to work. "I live in one now and I've gotten to know a lot about how guys think and feel and live," one freshman woman said. "Since I don't have brothers, I was completely clueless before this year. I think it's a great idea. Of course, in order for a set-up like this to work, there can't be anything more than friendships; know the person--it seems like a game.'

In spite of problems that occur, men-women relationships seem to be in full swing at UCSB. In the survey, most of the students who claimed they didn't have a boy/girlfriend wished they did. One woman said, "I'd like to have someone special with whom I could spend my time and share my thoughts and feelings."
