Dining with the Living Dead

By Garrett H. Omata
Special Sections Editor

On the eve of Halloween, as the last remnants of daylight drifted away, there was a thumping far beneath the dank, moist earth of the graveyard. A rock rolled aside, a bit of dust scattered into the air. The ground heaved in the pain of unnatural birth, and the Vampire King rose from his crypt.

With unliving eyes the King examined the world, peering into its shadows and its secrets. He lifted his head and gave the call. It was not a sound that a man or animal makes, but something like the sound of Time ripping through flesh and blood. It was the cry of the undead.

And they came. They pushed through the mortar and pinewood and came to his side. Some were missing arms, bellies, eyes and whole heads. But they all came and bowed to his feet and waited for their instructions.

The Vampire King felt his full stature rise within him. The rags he took with him from his grave were like colors of royalty to his subjects. He addressed them.

"Tonight," he said in a hypnotic tone, "tonight we feed!"

And he opened his copy of the Daily Nexus' Dining and Entertainment guide. He wasn't in the mood for seafood, but something stirred within him when it came to fresh oysters. He glanced over the Italian section, his yellow eyes tense with concentration.

"Who feels like Italian?" he cried. The thump of decaying flesh was dim.

"How about continental?" The rattle of bones was a little louder. The Vampire King was not satisfied, and was even getting a bit peeved. He had the complete listing of the best restaurants and nightspots in the tri-county area. There must be something in here to satisfy them all.

Exhaling a cool salty mist, he continued his search.

"Okay, how about this. We go down to State Street, grab a bite at Zelo's, and then check out the scene in Isla Vista?"

A resounding roar of terror went up. Yes, he thought, that would be their mission. The King raised his head to the moon and smiled at its beauty. Tonight they would feed. And then party it up.
