Cafe au Lait Is Fine French

By Thor Garcia

Hey — who put the Paris in Goleta?

Rising from the pucky, mauvish pastiche of the La Cumbre mall in scenic Goleta is Cafe au Lait, as tidy and shiny a bit of Europe as you're likely to find this side of the Aleutian Islands.

And just where is Jacques Yves-Cousteau, anyway?

As its name implies, Cafe au Lait is about coffee — frothy, gooey, steaming, rich coffee goodness served in bowl-size mugs, the perfect accompaniment for earnest discussions about The Future and snobby people who work in law offices and guys who brought food to high school in a G.I. Joe lunch box. Yeah, your basic Paris mindset, except no one (what a relief!) was speaking French.

That's what happened to me this week at Cafe au Lait, and let me just tell you something: the crepes did not get in the way.

Oh sure, there were the requisite high number of suspiciously bearded middle-aged men lounging around the Cafe's outdoor patio and glass-walled interior, but that was not a distraction. And the crepes, no, they were not in the way.

No, there was no distracting me and my companion from diving tongue-first into a steaming cauldron of "sinus-clearing" black bean soup — perhaps the finest black bean orgasm this side of a three-bean salad. Imagine grandpa's baked beans, only better, a touch more tangy and robust, a bit fuller in form. That's Cafe au Lait's black bean delight.

I should watch what I say about the crepes. My stigma with the brown, streamlined pigs-in-a-blanket type goodies stretches back to an overly enthusiastic stepfather looking for a gimmick at Sears to keep my mom impressed. You get the idea, but sadly it didn't work; I do gotta be honest.

But I mean, here we were, ladling up big mouthfuls of the black bean soup, and I'm staring through the quasi-marble pillars at a large, pastel painting of what appears to be many men imagining themselves to be Prince or Robert DeNiro hoisting platters of spaghetti at a small cafe, and I'm thinking, "Why not crepes? Why the heck not the

Who could ask for a better chef? It's pride like the kind this chef is displaying that catapults a restaurant to the greatness that is Cafe au Lait.

crepes?"

I checked the crepes listing once more on the menu (my sinuses really clearing up now) and focused in on the crepes: salmon and spinach; chicken with artichoke; and shrimp with black beans and cheese in provencale sauce. I sighed and took in another delicious mouth-heaping of black beans, for the first time in recent memory considering the relative merits of shrimp. The quandary, a river of saliva putting me in an eerie dog-like position.

There was too much, far too much, to choose from — at least more than I expected from an establishment that nominally billed itself as a coffee house. A quick check of side one of the menu fills you in on the usual caffeine business, but person, how was I to expect salads, fresh pastas, individual pizzas, grilled sandwiches and those deadly, rapturously forbidden triple-folded crepes!

And here's the kicker: Nothing — and I mean nothing, save the occasional daily special or two (which, of course, includes fish) — goes for more than seven dollars. Dude!

Cafe au Lait may be the ultimate snack place — check that, the penultimate snack boutique. It's the perfect glass hollow for a pre-evening on the town coffee pick-me-up and exquisite, tasteful and classy cuisine. It's the kind of place you'll go to in order to steel yourself for an afternoon of shopping right there at the mall.

When I say the food is classy, it's not due to the inherent class-consciousness that comes with coffee obsession nor with Impressionist painters. It has to do with excellent, even exotic food, at the right price.

Cafe au Lait is definitely health conscious, and that improves the finesse and verve of their menu. Try finding a three-lettuce salad with enoki mushrooms somewhere in Isla Vista. Pinpoint where they serve linguine in peanut sauce with roasted eggplant. And pizza — I dare you to find me a place closer than the La Cumbre mall that serves you three kinds of great, inventive pizzas: the eggplant, olive and goat cheese combo; the button mushroom and artichoke heart combustion; and the smoked chicken with rosemary pesto. Like I thought.

Take a trip to Cafe au Lait. It's a quick sortie down the 101. Enjoy unusual cuisine. And after a blast from their coffee expertise, you won't be falling asleep soon after.

Cafe au Lait is located in La Cumbre Plaza on upper State St. Open Mon-Fri 10 am-9 pm and Sat-Sun 10 am-7 pm. Phone 687-9873.

Point of Order: Alex's is Great!

By Stephen Lynne-Bachelor

After about three frustrating hours in our steamy, bite-sized kitchen, I was getting the idea that Max didn't know how to make tacos.

We had three turkeys in the oven and five on the kitchen counter, defrosting. Max had a brew of "hot sauce" that had been cooking in the microwave for over a half hour. The sauce looked OK, but when I mentioned to Max that he might have put too many bananas in it, he got kind of irate.

Max had tried to teach me how to separate eggs for the tortilla dough, but since I've never been very good at juggling, a number of them landed on the floor or, worse still, on Max's head, effectively soiling his wig. The hot sauce in the microwave started smoking furiously and set off the smoke alarm. Max, whose temper had risen because his dough had not, started throwing selections from our spice rack at the alarm to quiet it. Paprika did the job, knocking it off the wall.

While Max busied himself trying to extinguish the kitchen curtains that had inexplicably caught fire, I began to grate the cheese in the blender. After an ill-fated attempt to cook the tortillas that had pretty much destroyed our toaster, the future of our security deposit looked about as good as that of the yams that we were sun-drying out on the sidewalk.

With some urgency, I pulled the flaming wig off Max's head and stomped out the fire on the linoleum. I grabbed Max by the apron, held him close, and screamed in his ear: "Max! We must go now to Alex's Cantina, Goleta!"

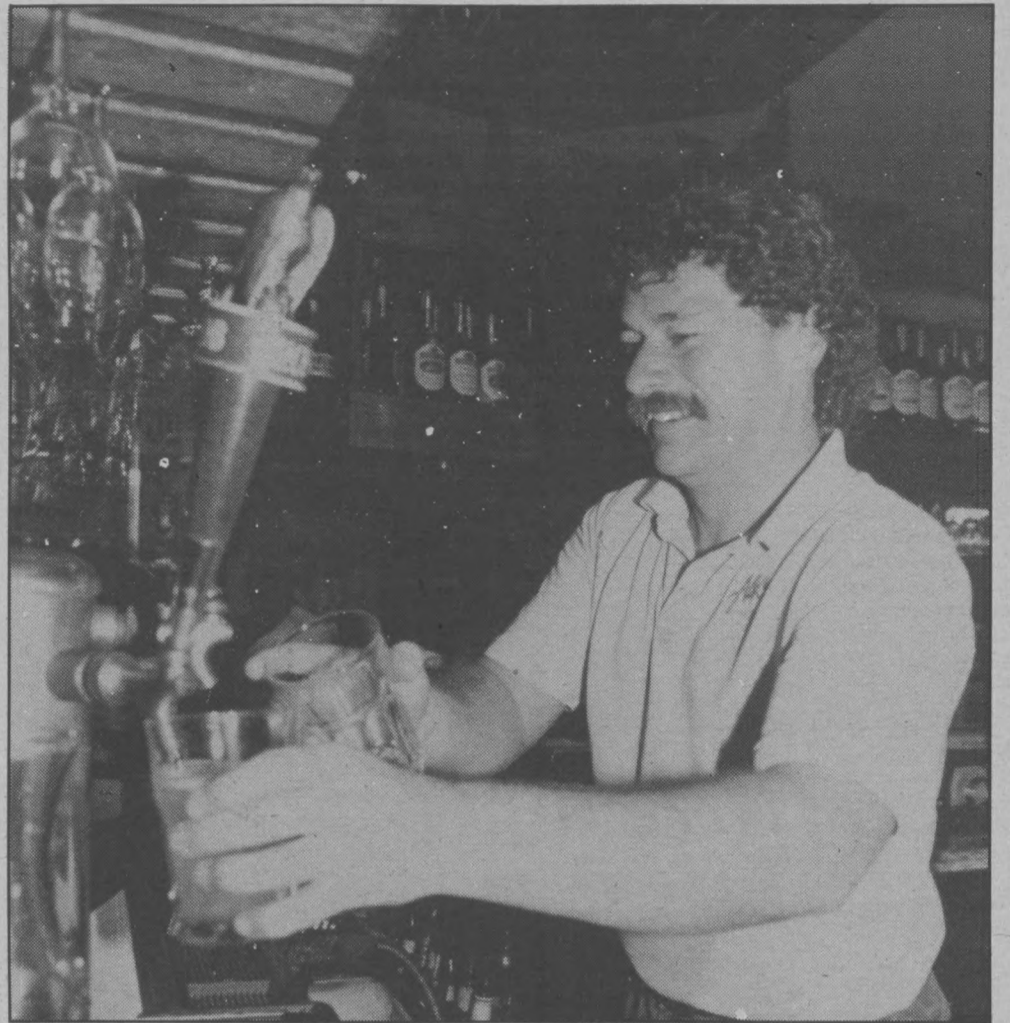

Somewhat confused, Max stared emptily at the messy, slightly glowing ember our kitchen had become. He looked at me. "I'll warm up the car," he said finally, and, putting on his slippers, was out the door in a second. I turned off all of the ovens, broilers, toasters and blenders, and on second thought, doused the kitchen with the fine, white foam from the fire extinguisher. There would be no fires while we were out dining.

On agreement, we decided to drive by the beige condo of Todd, our new friend, to see if he wanted to come with us. After learning that we were going to Alex's, Todd scooted in the front seat of Max's winsome American compact vehicle, and we were on our way.

What can be said of Goleta's Hollister "restaurant row" that hasn't already been said? We didn't know so we just let the cool sounds of the Starlight Vocal Band carry us on the slow ramble to Alex's. At Max's suggestion, we parked in the parking lot, and walked in through the easy-access back entrance.

We were instantly greeted by the happy hour crowd in the bar area that abuts the main restaurant section. They had a couple hockey and basketball games on TV, a couple sumo matches going on live in the corner, a tremendous buffet of fresh garden goodies and an efficient, free taco machine turned on "high." The three of us did a cumulative swoon as all of these things met our hungry eyes in an incredible culinary montage. We were tempted to just stay at the happy hour, but we knew what larger, richer pleasures would meet us in the main restaurant.

We got a booth in the

If this picture is any indication, Alex's Cantina is definitely the party place for great food, hospitable service, and healthy drinks.

non-smoking section (Max is allergic to sulfur matches), and quietly sipped at the ultra-reasonably priced and delicious margaritas. Max is such a fan of Alex's Cantina he had made up his mind on his order before we had even sat down; he wanted Alex's Chimichangas. "Gimme Chimi," he said a little too loudly.

The decision was a little harder for Todd and myself. To make his decision a little easier, Todd snuck around the restaurant posing as a representative from the Board of Health and sampled one or two bites from everybody's meal. When he came back, he looked at us and very seriously said, "I needa fajita," and was silent once more.

I was in a quandary. Alex's Cantina offers all of the great meals that made Mexico famous. Big burritos, small burritos, Burrito Verde, Burrito Especial, all kinds of enchiladas, tostadas, and Alex's famous Arroz con Pollo, just to name a few. I opted for the Guacamole Burger.

We ordered up another round of margaritas and enjoyed a fine conversation about traction while we waited for our food. When it came (and it did come quick), we paid careful mind to the waitress' warning of "Watch it! Plate's hot!" She needn't've warned Todd — his fajita plate came sizzling out of the kitchen on a hot plate (What a spectacle!). His plate even came with a pot holder should he be fool enough to try and touch it. But he had no time to touch — he was too busy eating! As were Max and I.

I tried to slow down the frenzied feeding with verbal warnings of, "Max! Todd! This isn't a race, you know!" They acknowledged that they knew but they didn't seem to care. As evening wore on to night, we ate and ate and ate when we thought we couldn't eat any more, we did some soul-searching and realized that we probably could eat some more.

When the bill came, I had to slap Max, who had fainted. It was all much cheaper than we had expected, so we ordered up another round of margaritas for me and Todd and some black coffee for Max.

Alex's Cantinas are located at 5918 Hollister Ave. in Goleta and 633 State St. in Santa Barbara. Dining 11am-10pm daily. Phone 683-2577 and 966-0032, respectively.

City Broiler Is Definitely a Santa Barbara Classic

MARC SYVERTSEN Daily Nexus

The City Broiler just might win your heart!

By Charles Gomer Scott

We walked into the City Broiler around 6:30, and figuring it was a bit early for dinner, Kim and I had a drink and talked a bit.

About work. Men and women, her fixation with power. San Diego, planned communities, that stretch of Highway 101 going north where there's absolutely nothing — for a long, long time — and how weird that is the first time you drive it.

Politics, parents, pre-pubescent junior high dances when AC/DC was the only music to listen to, and then suddenly your little brother's going to college. Strange. About getting older, and life after university.

And we imagined that City Broiler is the type of place we'll probably hang out at after we graduate. Sitting there for four or five hours, eating and drinking and talking (above the sounds of a cool jazz trio that I'm told plays regularly), you really get to know someone. Just the reason for this sort of date and this kind of restaurant.

As I said, we got there too early for dinner, or at least it seemed too early to us. It was one of those temperate Santa Barbara days, sort of chilly-sunny, so we went inside rather than sitting on the patio, which looked pretty inviting through the restaurant's full length windows.

We watched the sun as it started to kind of creep away, the way afternoons lazily drift into dusk and then, somewhere down the line, become night. No, it's Santa Barbara, so let's call it evening. The City Broiler is an evening sort of place.

Our server was about as relaxed as we were, letting us dine at our own pace. By the time the sun had completely set, and the strings of lights had turned the patio into something like a giant effervescent atrium, we were munching on garlic bread (server's suggestion!) and salads.

The appetizers looked great — stuff like breaded and fried calamari frittata and escargot — but we decided to hold back on the first course and go all out on the main entrees.

One thing to keep in mind about City Broiler is in the name: broiler. That's right, the place has a broiler in the heart of the restaurant, and you can even sit at it and watch the cooks do their thing. We were at a table, but their show was still sort of audible, even from afar.

Unlike my date, who ordered the fettucine primavera (white cream sauce, garlic and fresh vegetables; chicken or prawns optional), I wanted to take advantage of the trademark broiler. After listening to the specials of the day, I ordered: broiled halibut in a champagne tarragon cream sauce.

Just say it, champagne tarragon cream sauce; it even sounds good, doesn't it? That's why it's a "special," or so we guessed.

Entrees are served with a side of rice or fresh vegetable of the day, and we added even more City Broiler garlic bread — our own touch — for effect. Now mind you, it may seem that we made our choices easily, but that is far from the truth.

There was linguine, and angel's hair pasta a la lori (basil, fresh roma tomatoes, garlic and olive oil), and lasagna, and cannelloni, and steaks and herbal chicken, and a whole bunch of other seafoods to choose from. Sounds a bit overwhelming. Overwhelmingly good, that is.

Just when it seemed the feasting had to come to an end, up walks this dessert tray, crammed with — count 'em — four cheesecakes, three different apple pie/torte things, glazed strawberries, and chocolate, chocolate, chocolate! Wow!

They really threw down on the desserts. The cheesecake and apple pie things we split were ... amazing, decadent, heavenly. I can't say it enough, we're talking serious indulgence, the perfect end to a grand dining experience.

So we hung out after it was over, sipping coffee, listening to jazz and talking. About her, and me. Past dates (didn't match up), other places, the amazing plants serpentine their way around the interior of the restaurant, "and wouldn't that rubber tree look great in my place?"

And wouldn't we like to come back to City Broiler again? And again, and again, and again.

The City Broiler is located at 1129 State Street in Santa Barbara. Lunch 11am to 3pm, dinner 5 to 10pm. Phone 965-8500.

Luner's Sound & Lighting: Party Like the Pros!

By Jill Weisskopf

When the cutest boy in my Russian economics class asked me out, I nearly died. Tony had flirted with me quite a few times, but it seemed like he'd flirt with just about any girl. The difference was, I didn't notice him actually date any of the women he talked with.

"Hey where are you planning on taking me tonight?" he asked in a teasingly forward manner.

"Excuse me?" I taunted.

"Well the way I see it, you're young, I'm young, the night is young, Ken Griffey junior's young, Matt Young, Carl Jung, The Young and the Restless," he babbled.

I knew what he was saying. It was written all over the tickets he was pulling out of the Ticketron envelope. It read "Exene Cervanka (of X) at Carnival."

My knees shook a little.

"So do you wanna come?" he asked.

I hesitated a little.

"Well, you know, Exene is great and all," he smoothly said. "But what's really cool is that the sound and lighting isn't being done by one of those cheap companies I know you've heard about. It's being done by Leonard's, er, Luigi's, er..."

"You mean Luner's?" I had heard of them.

A dazzling, wickedly affirmative smile parted his lips and he outstretched his hand, offering it to me and I took it. He pulled me closer, I stumbled a bit (being flattery in my tummy) as his eyes glistened when he bent down a little towards me. He whispered in my ear: "Yes."

My best friend Amy Jo had told me about a party she went to once which Luner's provided the lights and sound for. She told me it was one of the greatest party experiences she'd ever encountered. She said the whole night flashed before her like one big, blurry beautiful firework of color and kerrang. She said that even though the boys were dumb and the girls were creepy, even though the beer was warm and there was no ice for the Singapore Slings, even though the caviar was too salty and the brie was way too runny, Amy Jo stayed there right up until the very last note of the last song and danced until the last Luner light lit. According to what I had heard, Luner's offers a multitude of state of the art, high-tech light and sound thingamajigs and whatsits guaranteed to accent any party, gathering, shindig, hoo-down (especially hoo-downs — ed.), and hootenannies.

Tony picked me up in his shiny black '66 Mustang and couldn't have looked more handsome. I felt like a princess and he was so gallant and chivalric when he asked me which AC/DC eight-track I'd like to hear.

"Oh I don't care," I said.

"Ahh, sure ya don't," he laughed and we squealed out of the San Nic parking lot.

When we arrived at Carnival, fashionably late, Exene was already on stage. As the bouncers frisked Tony I could hear her loud and oh-so clear. It was like she was right there on the curb with us. And the lights, they were so lifelike, just like policeman's lights.

And then, wait a minute, I realized that it was the police, and my Tony was face down on the curb with his hands manacled behind him as the mustachioed deputy read him his rights.

"Hey what's going on?" I cried.

"Are you with this character?" the deputy glared.

"Uhm, ah ... sorta," I hesitated.

"She's got nothing to do with this," Tony pleaded. Tony didn't look so cute any more. I felt like crying, but first I had to know. I deserved to know, didn't I? Please tell me, tell me, whatever did my Tony do so wrong.

"Your date has a banana in his pocket," the officer said. "We're afraid it may be dangerous."

The music played loud and clear like a finely maintained compact disc player, and the lights flashed through the windows, blitzing like an Illinois thunderstorm, as the policeman, with gloved hands, rustled through Tony's jacket pocket and retracted a firm, brown, ten-inch banana.

"Ah ha!" the deputy exclaimed.

"Ah ha!" said the bouncers.

"Ah ha?" Tony asked.

"Yes, Ah Ha!" said the deputy. "I would recognize a banana like that anywhere. Let me ask you this one question Mr. Tony, and believe you me, you better answer it quickly and honestly: Where did you get this banana?"

All eyes turned to my date whose smooth forehead shone with perspiration and whose hands quivered behind him in the handcuffs as he squirmed on his back like an upturned cockroach. He gasped, grittily: "Tijuana."

"I knew it! Take him downtown," the deputy said to his assistant, forgetting that we were already downtown. "You're 'date,' ma'am, is being arrested for the federal offense of transporting unauthorized fruit across the border. Bail will be around $3,000. Would you like to ride to the station with us?"

I watched Tony being led into the car and I heard Exene singing in the background as the lights flashed our shadows onto State Street. As I watched his head accidentally slammed into the hood of the car, I was compelled by the fantastic lights, and I realized all the fun that the Carnival patrons seemed to be having. I looked once more at the pair of tickets I had in my hand and said, "No, actually, I think I may be down after the show."

I found a pleasant-looking long-haired man with a guitar. I assumed that he'd like to hear Exene play and watch Luner's lights in full effect.

I was right. He gladly accepted my offer and we left the show blown away by the fantastic spectacle and sound extravaganza. On my cab ride home all I could think of was how great it sounded and how good-looking Exene appeared. It wasn't until the next morning that I realized that Tony was probably still in jail. But the whole time I'd been thinking of the soul-satisfying light and sound show that I had seen, and how it reminded me of accounts I'd heard of certain Grateful Dead shows.

Kyoto Offers Great Japanese Victuals!

By Dirk Dave Dan Dunhill

The name's Dunhill. Dan Dunhill. Dave Dan Dunhill. Dirk Dave Dan Dunhill. I'm a private eye, but I'm trying to get prescription lenses.

I was in my office one night. It was hot. Really hot. The kind of hot that makes people say, "Hey, is it hot, or is it just me?"

Then she walked in. She was some kind of woman. She had gams up to her lower torso and a set of baby-blue peepers to match. She told me her name was Sasha Strongbody. I knew I was in for trouble.

"Mr. Dunhill," she said, "I need your help."

"Call me Dan," I said. "And watch your language."

"Dan," she said, "Yo necesito tu ayuda."

"Call me Dave," I said.

"Dave," she said, "J'ai besson de ton aide."

"Call me Dirk," I said.

"And pardon your French."

"Dirk," she said, "Jag behøver din hjælp."

I said nothing. I knew her little game. It wasn't going to work.

"I'm scared to eat ... fish," she said.

An assortment of bad jokes came to mind. Really bad jokes. So bad they smelled. Really smelled. Smelled like a pizza you've left under your armpit for three and a half days straight. Then I thought: I could help. Or maybe I couldn't — I didn't know.

I decided to take her to a little sushi joint called Kyoto. It was on State Street. Real high class. I found it real easy, not because I'm a P.I., but because it was real easy to find. My Plymouth Sport Fury slid nicely into one of the many parking stalls.

But ample parking was not the only reason I liked this place. I liked Kyoto because they served steak, seafood, tempura and sushi. They serve every kind of Japanese food a guy could imagine, and then some he couldn't. Huge menus, with reasonable prices. Real reasonable. Reasonable as Jack "Iron Lung" Napier when he realizes that his gun is out of bullets, but yours is still loaded. If Sasha was really scared of fish, Kyoto was the place to cure her.

We could have sat at the bar, but we didn't. I didn't want my back to the door. Especially with Rick "Babyface" Harker out on bail. We could have sat in one of Kyoto's little booths like they have in all classy Japanese restaurants, where you take off your shoes and sit real close to the ground when you eat, but we didn't. I didn't want Sasha to see that my socks had holes. Big holes. Really big holes. The kind of holes that a guy could drive a Chevy Malibu through, but not a Buick Road Master. That's too big. We sat at a table.

Our waitress left us to decide. A lotta good eats to choose from. Looking up from the menus, our eyes met. There was more chemistry in that gaze than in an entire box of pop tarts. There was only one thing I could say, but she beat me to it.

Her lips slowly, sensually parted: "Let's order the Kyoto Combination."

I could barely stay in my seat, but I did. Images of eight different kinds of Japanese food, including sushi and vegetable tempura, raced through my head.

I could read her like a second grade intermediate text book. She was thinking of one thing and one thing

MARC SVERTSEN Daily Nexus

only: the soup, salad, rice, fresh vegetables, fresh fruit and green tea that came with the meal.

The service was quick, but our eating was slow. Really slow. Slow like ... well, just slow. Her fear of seafood seemed to pass. I offered her some of my beef teriyaki. She said she didn't want to take it too fast. I could wait. She asked if I wanted any shrimp tempura. One blow too many to the back of the head with a crustacean should have made me say no, but I didn't. It was delicious. Not greasy at all. How could all this food come in one meal? Was there a catch? There wasn't.

After our meal, we talked and drank beer. I love beer. It was some little Japanese number called Asahi. It was great. Really great. Really great like really great beer, like ... well, you get the picture.

The hostess smiled and thanked us. Come to think of it, the whole staff had been nice the whole time. They treated us like royalty. Not the kind of royalty you find on the faces of twelve cards out of a fifty two card deck, soaked with beer and spread out on a broken table in an old sacked out grill: The Home of the Original Topless Banana Wrestling." No, they treated us like the kind of royalty that has a castle with gold doors and bidets, whatever the hell those are.

I remembered how they helped us. When our meal had arrived, I recognized nothing. Exotic raw fish and tempting fried vegetables swirled in my head. Panic set in. "Don't panic, Dirk," I thought to myself. The waitress saw the look of mayhem in my eyes, and was quick to point out what was mackerel, what was salmon, and what was ... eggplant. I'll never forget her for that. Service with a smile. An old cliché, but it works.

I drove Ms. Strongbody home. We arrived at her artsy I.V. studio. I walked her to her door. You just couldn't trust this neighborhood. Especially since Ratface "Charles" Hatfield had busted outa Sing Sing.

She said good night and held me tight. I didn't mean to rhyme that. Again, she looked into my eyes. We kissed. It was a big kiss. So big it was huge. So huge it was vast. It was a hell of a kiss.

When I opened my eyes she was gone, like a paperboy before dawn. I might have loved her. I might have felt like we should just be friends. I walked, whistling, into the night. All I had to remember Sasha Strongbody was a pair of chopsticks, with a phone number wood-saudered on them. I had a feeling I'd be seeing her soon. But more importantly, I had a feeling I'd be going back to Kyoto.

Kyoto is located at 3232 State St. in Santa Barbara. Open Tues-Sun 5-10 pm, lunch Tues-Fri 11:30 am-2 pm. Phone 687-1252.

This Saturday, the annual Extravaganza will be held by the lagoon. It will be an all day event featuring eight bands: Montague, Everlast, Timmy Gatling, Milestone Easy, The Itch, The Groov, The Havalians and Agent Orange. Although there will be bands throughout the day the band that should not be missed is Agent Orange. Agent Orange has been playing for years and their stage show is worth waiting all day for. I know you do not like going on campus during the weekends, but this Saturday you should make an exception.
